Not illustrated. 1859 Excerpt: . ascertained, and which the practitioner vainly endeavours to remove by the internal administration of medicines? Even in private practice, where there would be no obstacle to the free use of baths, how seldom do they form part of the treatment, unless there should happen to be any existing disease of the skin! In many instances, however, the digestive powers become deranged, and the general health is undermined, from a neglect to pay proper attention to the state of the skin; and a large proportion of the catarrhal, rheumatic, and nervous affections so prevalent in the variable climate of Great Britain, might be traced to the same source. The tendency to these complaints, as well as to pulmonary consumption, would be materially lessened, were persons, while in health, accustomed to attend to the functions of the skin, by the employment of bathing and cold ablutions more frequently than is generally the case. Many people, it is true, who perhaps never take a bath, yet enjoy good health, for the influence of habit will often enable the body to support many things that are generally prejudicial. But, on the other hand, there is no doubt that many suffer from various unpleasant sensations and disordered states of health, referable to this neglect, which might be prevented by the more frequent use of the bath. Floyer, in his work on Cold Bathing, adverts to the employment of water as a remedial means from a very early period at the...
